Emory Thomas, Jr. is publisher of the Puget Sound Business Journal, named by the Society of American Business Editors and Writers as one of the top business weeklies in the country. Thomas served as editor of the newspaper for two years before becoming publisher in April 2006.

Prior to joining the Business Journal, Thomas served as a business journalist in both the print and online arenas, and as a publishing entrepreneur, as well. His career includes tenures at The Wall Street Journal, MSNBC at its launch, and as an editor at MSN Money, Microsoft's leading financial Web site. While at MSNBC, Thomas did regular on-air segments with CNBC. He also co-founded two small publishing companies and served as vice president for Business.com.

Early in his career, Thomas joined the Atlanta Business Chronicle, where he twice won national recognition for a Gerald Loeb Award for Distinguished Business and Financial Journalism. He lives in Seattle with his wife, Laura, and their two children.
